Rawonda is excited about Rahib, the new man in her life. He has asked her to marry him and she has accepted, only she had shocked him by saying she would first like to submit to some strange cultural practices that traditionally should accompany the wedding.

Rahib says no, that they are barbaric, outdated and degrading. But his determined fiancé is sticking to her guns.

Rahib must decide if he is willing to still marry her if she submits. He must also take Rawonda's warning seriously, which is simply that if she can't have him, then no woman can.
